Executives must document training to meet regulatory requirements, but compliance with regulations is not the only reason to keep training records. Training documentation may be required as part of an internal management or quality system. Training records are also useful for assessing the effectiveness of training programmes. Training records show that the soldiers attended certain classes. Typically, the training documentation includes the subject of the training, the name of the instructor, the date and the name of the trainee. The coach passes a record sheet during the training session or keeps a separate file for each soldier. Some trainers have each trainee sign or initials the training documentation. Although the format of training documents varies, all training documentation must be kept up to date and should be reviewed after each training session. Here is an example of a sergeant's memorandum: Other types of documentation may be useful to trainers. Although not exactly "record", the contents of the training program can be used to document how soldiers were trained. Quizzes can be used to measure the effectiveness of the workout. Many trainers use surveys to get input for the training program. All of this documentation can be part of a complete record-keeping training program. sergeants-time-training-sign-in-rosterDownload Word Doc About Sergeants Time Training NCOs are the primary trainers of our soldiers. Sergeant Time Training (STT) offers a great opportunity to develop our front-line leaders while trusting their soldiers. Commanders of active components should establish the STT as a regular part of the unit training program. This will allow non-commissioned officers to train their soldiers in a small group environment. Tasks must go all the way to the Battalion Mission (METL) Essential Activity List and commanders must focus on quarterly training. September 10-19Welcome to Canada Army Run: Virtual 2021We are pleased to welcome you to the Virtual Event 2021. Canada Army Run is more than just a race. It's about Canadians and the Canadian Armed Forces coming together in the spirit of camaraderie and community. It's an opportunity for the troops to extend the military spirit to the Canadians and thank them for their support. And it is an opportunity for Canadians to men and women who serve them in many ways at home and abroad. Join us in this year's virtual edition of Canada Army Run.
